About the artwork

| The Family |

A family is never made of one emotion.

It is built from warmth and witnessing.

From inherited fears.

From tenderness disguised as survival.

From the silent roles we carry for one another without ever speaking them aloud.

In The Family, four figures merge into a single unstable structure; no clear beginning, no separation, no distance. Their bodies become psychological landscapes marked by symbols: eyes that suggest memory and constant observation, suns that radiate protection and presence, flowers that insist on softness, stars that preserve fragments of innocence.

The work refuses traditional portraiture. Instead, it presents family as emotional imprint something carried in the body long after childhood ends.

Set against an electric blue void, the figures appear suspended between intimacy and isolation, confronting the viewer with a question both personal and universal:

How much of ourselves truly belongs to us, and how much was shaped by the people who raised us, loved us, wounded us, and kept us alive?

The Family is not simply about relatives.

It is about the invisible architecture of human connection.
